

Autonomous Weaponized Robots As Certain As Tomorrow's Sunrise

TN Note: The scary part here is the 'autonomous' factor. A robot, drone or swarm with instructions to neutralize a specific target or threat can act without further human intervention or knowledge to accomplish its mission. Of course, benevolent technology could benefit and protect humans, but the real problem are those who would misuse the technology to control and manipulate humans. In fact, this kind of technology is perfectly suited for social engineering (aka Technocracy) because it is driven by efficiency and AI technology.

Robots have been keeping police officers safe for years by disposing of bombs and assisting in hostage situations, but a rapid increase in technology could trigger a robot revolution over the next decade.

Robots are already being weaponized: In 2014, a South African company started selling drones that could shoot 80 pepper balls per second, and police in North Dakota have been cleared to use a type of drone that is armed with tear gas and Tasers. Police use of Tasers—they're designed to be nonlethal but can trigger cardiac arrest—killed 540 Americans from 2001 to 2013, according to Amnesty International. Right now, this technology requires an operator to remotely control the robots and the weapons. But autonomous weaponized robots are already being used by the Israeli military to patrol that nation's borders, and a Texas company has created a drone to hover over private property and, without human instruction, fire a Taser dart to keep a potential intruder under shock until the authorities arrive. Imagine a convergence in technology that also gives these robots facial-recognition capability. Given the right circumstances, such as a terrorist threat, these robots could be rolled out in large numbers to protect citizens.

Climate Deniers Strike Back In Paris During UN Climate Summit

TN Note: Wanted posters of climate “deniers” were posted all over Paris, but it only served to give additional publicity to the top climate scientists who were there to debunk global warming hysteria and junk science. And, debunk they did. CFACT held a world-premier viewing of its new documentary called Climate Hustle, hosted by Mark Murano. The venue was packed out by eager truth-seekers from around the world.

“Ooh look, it’s James Delingpole, the most hateful man in Britain. No I WON’T pose for a photograph with you, you piece of filth. Go away don’t touch me,” snarled an unhappy crusty-looking fellow, as I squeezed through the throng of protestors at entrance. I was dressed in black tie; they were dressed for the revolution.

“Join us! We’re your friends,” cooed three girls in blonde wigs and sparkly coal miners’ outfits handing out lumps of coal. (They weren’t really my friends. They were green activists too. But, like most of the renta-mob crowd, perfectly amiable)

“Howl! Howl!” bayed two men dressed as giant spoons.

Then the police turned up and in characteristic no-nonsense French style forced the protestors to disperse before the stars - including 92-year old rocket scientist Fred Singer and Greenpeace co-founder Patrick Moore - in black tie arrived in their stretch limos and walked up the red carpet.

It was the perfect launch for Marc Morano’s climate skeptical movie Climate Hustle - the skeptics’ long-awaited answer to Al Gore’s An Inconvenient Truth - which staged its triumphant world premiere in Paris last night.

The protestors had come fresh from the COP21 climate conference, alerted by Wanted posters plastered by activists over the streets of central Paris warning them that seven of the world's most evil fossil fuel lobbyists were in town to disrupt their holy mission to bomb the global economy back to the dark ages with carbon reductions, regulations and wealth redistribution.

In fact though - an irony lost on the protestors: they really don't do irony, these people - it was the greenies who were doing all the disrupting.

Earlier in the day they'd tried to sabotage a conference of climate skeptics being hosted in central Paris by the Heartland Institute. (You can see the footage of the presentation - Examining The Data - here).

Now they'd come to jeer outside a film they'll never watch made by people they won't listen to presenting a message they're ideologically incapable of comprehending.

If they ever did see Climate Hustle it would be totally lost on them.

Climate Hustle is the Anti Inconvenient Truth. It's for people with an open mind who want to know what's really going on with the world's climate - as opposed to what hucksters like Al Gore want to persuade them is going on with the world's climate - all backed up with hard data and evidence presented by scientists who know and understand, among them the Nobel-prize-winning Norwegian physicist Ivar Giaever.
